

Mark Zuckerberg Doesn't Understand Journalism | The Atlantic

By Adrienne LaFrance

May 9, 2018

Zuckerberg runs a media company that distributes news, but doesn't have a proper newsroom. He runs a media company that has—with Google's help—dominated the vast majority of digital ad dollars and eviscerated the journalism industry's business model, all while preaching about the importance of journalism. He runs a media company that, he says, believes deeply in the need to sustain independent journalism, but won't pay publishers to license journalistic content. And he runs a media company that has decided to show its users less news from professional outlets—it's really not what people want to see, he says—in favor of more individual opinions.

[...]

Deciding what to believe based on other people's opinions is not only not journalistic, it's arguably hostile to the press as a democratic institution. The truth may be nuanced, but reportable facts are often quite straightforward. As any journalist can tell you, the best answer to the question "what happened?" is not why don't you ask a bunch of your friends what they think, organize their views along a spectrum, and then decide where to plant yourself.

Source: Mark Zuckerberg Doesn't Understand Journalism | The Atlantic