MediaWell

News Item

The World Has a Plan to Rein in AI—but the US Doesn’t Like It | WIRED

By Tom Simonite
January 6, 2020

> In December 2018, Canada and France announced plans for a new international body to study and steer the effects of artificial intelligence on the world’s people and economies.
>
> Canadian prime minister Justin Trudeau said the International Panel on Artificial Intelligence would be established by the Group of Seven leading western economies and play a role in “addressing some of the ethical concerns we will face in this area.” It was to be modeled on the UN’s Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, which helped establish consensus on the world’s climate crisis and recommends possible responses.
>
> Just over a year later, the IPAI has been renamed the Global Partnership on AI, but it still hasn’t quite gotten off the ground. Six of the G7 are on board—with the United States the lone holdout.
>
> […]

Source: The World Has a Plan to Rein in AI—but the US Doesn’t Like It | WIRED