> NEW YORK — How do you tell if a scientific study is trustworthy? That was the question that three nurses discussed on a call-in radio show last Thursday night, in an effort to educate their community on the science around the COVID-19 vaccine.
>
> For one, the study's author should be an expert, the nurses said — like how if you have a question about kosher food, you go to a rabbi who is considered an expert on Jewish dietary law.
>
> The study's central experiment should also be logical and replicable, with other scientists able to reproduce the same results when following the study's method — like when cooking a classic Jewish casserole.
