

Coronavirus modelers factor in new public health risk: Accusations their work is a hoax | Washington Post

By William Wan and Aaron Blake

March 27, 2020

In the one month since the first U.S. coronavirus death, America has become a country of uncertainty.

New cases of infection and casualties continue multiplying. New York and Louisiana hospitals are grappling with a flood of patients that threatens to overwhelm their health-care systems. Meanwhile, the president and political conservatives are increasingly agitating to end drastic restrictions meant to buy time and save lives.

Running beneath it all, in a continuous loop through our national psyche, are basic questions leaders are struggling to answer: When can we safely lift these quarantines? How many people could die if we do it too early? Just how dangerous will this pandemic turn out to be? And what exactly should be our next step?

[...]

Source: Coronavirus modelers factor in new public health risk: Accusations their work is a hoax | Washington Post