

COVID-19 vaccine hesitancy plummets among Black and Latino Americans — but not white Republicans | Yahoo News

By Tim O'Donnell

March 2, 2021

As the United States adds another COVID-19 vaccine to its arsenal and ramps up its distribution drive, potentially pushing the country closer toward herd immunity, concerns about vaccine hesitancy among the population remain. But overall, it seems, people are growing increasingly comfortable with getting a shot. Data from the KFF Vaccine Monitor shows 55 percent of Americans have either already received a vaccine dose or plan on getting one as soon as possible, Axios reports. For context, back in December only 34 percent of people said they were prepared for inoculation without hesitation.

[...]

Source: COVID-19 vaccine hesitancy plummets among Black and Latino Americans — but not white Republicans | Yahoo News