Disinformation is becoming increasingly widespread—and troubling. From Russian attempts to influence the 2016 elections to Facebook's most recent revelation of a coordinated disinformation campaign ahead of the 2018 midterm elections, we're seeing more and more instances of disinformation cropping up in our social media feeds.

Earlier this year, we asked you to help shape our reporting on disinformation: What did you want to know about disinformation and how it works? Hundreds of you wrote back with questions about the issue: what it is, how to spot it, and effective ways to fight back.

Mother Jones talked to five different experts to help answer your questions. Here's what you wanted to know
