MediaWell

News Item

New policy briefing examines the amount of online abuse in the UK | The Alan Turing Institute

By Beth Wood
December 2, 2019

> The Alan Turing Institute's public policy programme today (27 November) publishes a new policy briefing, How much online abuse is there? A systematic review of evidence for the UK.
>
> The briefing identifies some considerable shortfalls in existing monitoring practices for online abuse and its recommendations include:
>
> 1. a representative survey dedicated to understanding the experience of people in the UK of online abuse should be administered each year.
> 2. a new platform for monitoring the prevalence of online abuse in real-time should be created.
> 3. Government statistics on different types of illegal online abuse should be made available in a single bulletin.
>
> […]

Source: New policy briefing examines the amount of online abuse in the UK | The Alan Turing Institute