

Tech Platforms are Racing to Combat Misinformation Before Elections. Is it Too Little, Too Late? | Poynter

By Daniel Funke & Susan Benkelman

April 11, 2019

This month, elections kick off in at least five countries around the world. As a result, Facebook and other tech platforms have been doing some last-minute preparation to try to protect their platforms from misinformation.

In India, where voters have been stricken with misinformation in the lead-up to the start of the general election this week, WhatsApp announced a new research project aimed at learning how rumors spread on the messaging app. That move, which launched just last week and was initially billed as a verification project (it isn't), came more than a year after fact-checkers started debunking hoaxes on their own institutional accounts.

[...]

Source: Tech platforms are racing to combat misinformation before elections. Is it too little, too late? - Poynter