

A newspaper has a novel strategy for covering one politician's falsehoods: Don't | The Washington Post

By Marisa Iati

March 17, 2021

Ohio's biggest newspaper is taking an unusual tack toward covering falsehoods from a U.S. Senate candidate: It doesn't plan to do so at all.

The Plain Dealer in Cleveland said its journalists intend to ignore inaccurate statements from Republican Josh Mandel that they consider to be ploys for attention.

"Mandel is pretty much a nobody right now, a nobody begging for people to notice his Tweets a year ahead of the Senate primary," Chris Quinn, the Plain Dealer's editor, wrote in an opinion piece published Saturday. "Just because he makes outrageous, dangerous statements doesn't mean it is news."

[...]

Source: The Plain Dealer in Ohio will ignore falsehoods from Republican Senate candidate Josh Mandel - The Washington Post