

This Former Tea Party Activist Is Teaching People To Spot Fake News | BuzzFeed

By Craig Silverman

May 3, 2018

Cravens' small but growing group stands out among the ranks of professional and amateur debunkers for its links to conservative politics. More media organizations than ever before are engaged in fact-checking and debunking. But some of the most prominent, such as Snopes and PolitiFact, are, fairly or unfairly, frequently dismissed as biased by conservatives. Liberal groups such as Media Matters for America are also heavily involved in efforts to track and debunk online misinformation.

Meanwhile, the Weekly Standard is the lone American conservative outlet working as a third-party fact-checking organization with Facebook to stop false content from spreading on its platform.

Source: This Former Tea Party Activist Is Teaching People To Spot Fake News